thought it knew about therapeutic change rogers proposed something radical what if the client not the therapist was the true expert on their own experience what if healing didn't come from brilliant interpretations or clever interventions but from the simple provision of certain relational conditions that would allow the client's natural tendency toward growth to flourish this wasn't merely a theoretical adjustment it was a complete reimagining of what it means to help another human being rogers observed that when people felt truly understood genuinely accepted and met with authentic presence something remarkable happened they began to trust themselves more deeply to explore their experiences more honestly and to discover their own capacity for insight and change the therapist's job wasn't to provide answers but to create the conditions in which the client's own wisdom could emerge
